

The analysis of the foreign donations to universities data shows that the middle east is donating huge sums of money, European and Canadian giftors are reliable targets for donations due to their donation count, and China remains an intriguing possibility for gifts. Based on the total amount Middle Eastern countries are donating to American universities, UVA should look to them as a source of donations. Qatar and Saudi Arabia in particular stand out as generous donors. England, Switzerland and Canada all donate large amounts (in count and in sum) and although UVA already receives Swiss and English donations, they should continue looking for investments from these countries due to how often donations are made. Lastly, China should be targeted as they are massive donors that UVA receives no money from.

The most eye-opening discovery in this analysis is the sheer quantity Qatar is donating to US universities. Based on the data, Qatar donated $2.7 billion to American colleges, almost twice as much as the second highest donating country, England, at $1.46 billion. Qatari donors average $3.9 million per donation while universities such as Cornell, Texas A&M and Carnegie Mellon have received sums of $1.02 billion, $504 million, and $425 million respectively from Qatari donors. Qatar isn't the only Middle Eastern country pouring money into America, as Saudi Arabia donated the 4th most ($1.06 billion) of any country and the UAE donated the 13th most. While UVA has received donations from Israel, it has not received any from the three aforementioned countries.

However, UVA is benefiting from the 2nd most generous and the most frequently donating country: England. England is UVA's fifth top donating country, which comes at no surprise considering the country provided 148% more national donations than the second most frequently giving country, China. In all four universities that I compared UVA to (VCU, VT, and UNC), England was a significant donor to all of them. Switzerland also donated the fourth most money to UVA, which is consistent with how frequently and how much they donate on a national basis (5th and 9th most of all countries respectively). The most surprising aspect of UVA's donation analysis is that Bangladesh is UVA's top donating country (donating $4.2 million dollars) despite only donating a total of $7 million to American universities. UVA receives over half of all of Bangladesh's donated money.

While comparing UVA to three similar universities (and taking the overall donation analysis into account), a strategy for finding new sources of money for UVA began to take shape. UVA was compared to three similarly sized state schools that are all close geographically: VCU, Virginia Tech and UNC. It is already established just how much Qatar and several of the middle eastern countries are donating to American universities, but digging deeper, we also see that two of UVA's peer institutions are also recipients of these donations. VCU has received a whopping $78,867,097 from Qatar while Virginia Tech has received donations from both Oman and the UAE. No other country donating to VCU comes close to Qatar's donation sums (England is their 2nd top donor at $2,496,691, a mere 3.2% of Qatar's donations). Another country that should be targeted is Canada. They are currently the 6th highest donating country nationally and UNC's top donor, but UVA receives no money from them. They frequently give (3rd most donations by a country), so there is a higher probability of landing donations. Finally, China cannot be ignored as a possibility for future donations. Nationally, they donate the 3rd most money and 2nd most frequently. Peer institute, Virginia Tech, has received Chinese donations, so they are a realistic target for UVA.

In conclusion, UVA should focus heavily on securing new donations from Middle Eastern countries (notably, Qatar), Canada, and China while also continuing to seek donations in England and Switzerland where they already have established success. Qatar, Saudi Arabia and other middle eastern countries' enormous donations are the biggest opportunity for UVA. Canada and China also provide promising opportunities as both have donated to peer institutes and both give large amounts of donations frequently. Lastly, England and Switzerland offer a familiar opportunity for donations based on their history of frequent giving.
